But if he was not learned in boyhood he was an adept in athletic exercises and in the use of weapons. He was a good wrestler, an expert fencer, a first-rate shot, and a sportsman. When he had arrived at the age of fifteen he became clerk to a notary named Meneston, who lived at Villers-Cotterets, remaining with him some months, when he moved to another town and obtained a similar position.

DUMAS' CHARACTER.

Undoubtedly Dumas was a man of genius. He, it may be said, created a new school of French literature. By his bold innovations more than to anything else, was the laterary world of France freed from subjection to arbitrary rules of composition. Dumas was also a wit, but his saillies were always good natured. We may add that he was openhearted and charitable. Here ends all we can say in favor of him. If we look at the other side of his character we find him shockingly dissolute. How many mistresses he kept during his lifetime we

His duties were very light and this enabled him to complete his education by self-bring the detestable soup which he made himstelf or the purpose of displaying his gastroubure. In the palace was a fine hibrary, to which he had access. He therefore availed himself of its use, reading a great he. number of books and taking numerous notes. By this time he had acquired a decided taste for the literary profession and was ambitious of becoming a successful

Although his income was still very small he contrived to support himself, his mother and his sieter upon it, and in his memoirs he states that at this time he was perfectly happy and contented. True to his first lessons in literary work, he adhered to the drama. His leisure hours were employed in constructing dramatic pieces, and he frequented the theatres for the purpose of studying scenic effects. For three years all the plays he wrote were rejected, but

English actors arrived in Paris and passed the season there performing Shakspeare's plays. Dumas one night saw Macready plays. It was his father, General Alexander Davy Dumas, who was the son of an African woman named Themsette Dumas, by the Marquis de la Palletene, a wealthy planter of St. Domingo. He was taken to France when a boy, received a good education, and won some distinction in the French republican armies, one of which he commanded. He also served for a time under Napoleon, but retaining his republican principles, he quarrelled with the Emperor, and his military career was out short. His son is the subject of this sketch.

A few weeks ago he was thought to be dying; but the old man rallied, and at last accounts he was at Dieppe; a mere wreck of his common self. If he be really dead, it is likely that the arrival of the Germans at Dieppe hastened his departure.

few poor romances. But at length he directed his attention to romance and the first substantial results were "Les Trois Mousquetaires" and "Le Comme de Monte Christo," both of which appeared at the same time, in 1844. With these novels every educated American is familiar. They are undoubtedly the best works written by Dumas. Their success was immense from the start. It would be tedimense from the start. FRUGGLES WITH ADVERSITY.

In 1806 General Dumas departed this life, leaving a wife and daughter in addition to the son. The lad's mother was an invalid, and her support, as also that of his sister, devolved upon him. The small salary he received from the notary barely sufficed to keep them from starvation. It was not, however, until 1820 that he thought of literature as a means of improving his pecuniary condition. Has entrance into the profession was by an accident. A young Parisian, named Adolphe de Leaven, staying in the same town with Dumas, had begun to write for the theatre. He proposed that Dumas join him, remarking that "to write for the theatre was a trade like any other, and only re-
